Trainees To Get M-16 Orientation

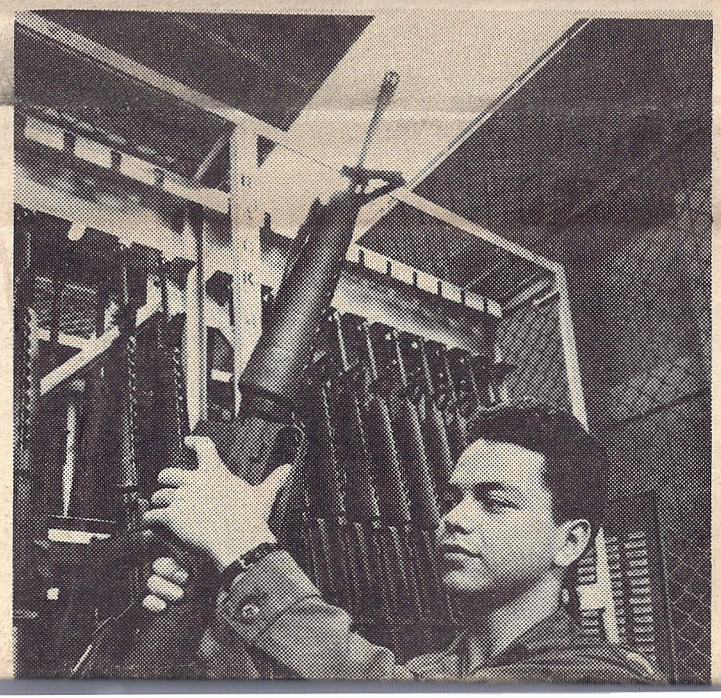
Soon Will Be Standard Rifle

The M-16 is well on the way to becoming the standard training rifle of basic trainees according to Pentagon officials.

The 12 hours of M-16 instruction for all basic trainees headed for a combat arms assignment, which is already under way, is the first phase of the program.

The second and final phase of the conversion is scheduled to be completed by the summer of 1969, when all trainees will be training with the M-16.

The Army is changing its training policies so combat arms personnel can get the instruction



Training Will Be Given Here During Sixth And Eighth Week

Basic trainees, who are destined for certain MOS's within the Combat Arms, are scheduled to begin training with the M-16 rifle here on Saturday.

With the arrival of 600 of the new weapons, trainees who are to proceed to Infantry, Armor, or Artillery AIT will now receive two days of training with the M-16. The training is to take place on Saturday of the sixth week of basic training and on Wednesday of the eighth week.

The first day will involve mechanical familiarization, including care and maintenance, magazine changing, principles of automatic rifle fire, sight zero, safety and fire distribution.

The second day, during the eighth week, will begin by zeroing in, prior to qualifying fire. Failure to qualify with the
